The air pressure differences will decrease over the weekend. Therefore, the clouds will break up more during Saturday daytime, with the sun shining intermittently, especially around midday. On Sunday and Monday, you can expect more sunshine, particularly in the mornings. In the afternoons, cumulus clouds will form, and isolated showers are possible. On Monday, a weather front from the Atlantic will reach us later in the day, bringing thicker clouds and more rain showers. In the high mountains, there will be a few snow showers again. However, the associated low-pressure system will then move further south and away from us. Therefore, high-pressure influence should increase in the second half of the week, stabilizing the weather somewhat. It will be pleasantly warm, especially in the afternoons.
