The Alps will be on the front side of a powerful low-pressure system over the North Atlantic this weekend. A weak cold front from the west is being directed towards our region, but it is significantly weakened by the high-pressure area situated over Eastern Europe, which will extend its influence to our area. Remaining compact cloud fields will frequently obscure the sun on Sunday. On Monday, the chances for sunshine will be better again, even though dense clouds will move in during the course of the afternoon. These clouds will continue to thicken towards Tuesday, but precipitation is hardly expected yet. It's not until midweek that the influence of disturbances with a cold front will become somewhat stronger. Overall, this influence is likely to be significantly weaker than previously assumed. Additionally, it still looks like there will be a noticeable cooling.
